

AFFECT PHOBIA THERAPY – WHAT IS IT?

Affect is another word for feelings. Feelings add energy and colour to our life. They help us make the right choices, set boundaries and be satisfied in contact with others.

When we are afraid to be overwhelmed by our emotions, or we learned not to express them, feelings can cause anxiety. This could be the beginning of an emotion – or affect - phobia, resulting in withdrawal, fear to be vulnerable, impaired relationships and difficulty to enjoy life to the fullest.

Consequences can be: depression, anxiety, panic attacks, tension, agitation, tiredness, vague physical complaints or being overwhelmed.

The purpose of Affect Phobia Therapy is to improve your mental health by experiencing all feelings freely. In that way you can express what moves you in relation to people around you through your emotions.

FOR WHOM? IF

- you suffer from persisting mental problems such as anxiety, depression and low self esteem. The problems may fade, but then they return. It seems to be a pattern.
- you have identity issues, e.g. it's hard to find your identity within a new culture or within more than one culture at once.
- it's hard to set boundaries and express yourself in a social context.
- you tend to withdraw from contact with others. For example, in your family, work or study.
- you have trouble adjusting in life.
- you are willing to examine your patterns and their effect on your relationships with others in and with the group.

WHY GROUP THERAPY?

We believe that difficulties people face in daily life will also occur in the relationships with group members and therapists.

This way you will work on your patterns within the group. It offers the possibility to practice thinking and acting differently.
